NORTHERN WHITE CEDAR

The best fences are built of Northern White Cedar because it combines durability and versatility. White Cedar heartwood is extremely resistant to decay and termites, even when used in close proximity to the ground. This is a natural resistance and usually no further treatment of the cedar is necessary. Northern White Cedar's combination of durability, and handsome grain and texture, gives the user a wide selection of finishes to choose from. A cedar fence can be left unfinished, to weatherbleach naturally to a beautiful silvery gray or the fence can be stained different colors to add contrast to the landscaping. A fence can protect your property or garden from the neighborhood wildlife and children, or it can keep your children and pets in the yard so you know where they are. You can use a fence as a space divider; to define an outdoor living area, or to screen a service yard. A fence can be a handsome backdrop for plantings, and help set just the right mood for the entire garden. Architecturally, a fence can be a picture frame for the home setting; or it can complement the house and make it look larger. To a homeowner, the most important physical qualities of cedar are the ones that save him the most money. Chief among these is cedar's durability, which enables the material to be used anywhere in the garden with assurance of long-lasting, trouble-free performance. The natural color, texture, and grain pattern of cedar are attractive and interesting. Cedar harmonizes with other materials and all types of architecture. Above all, cedar is a natural material at home in a garden setting.
